

World War One: The Battle for Communications

Conclusions

There were many different systems of communications available during World War One. Some, like carrier pigeons, sending letters, and semaphore flags, had been around hundreds if not thousands of years. Others like wireless telegraphy were less than 25 years old.

How would you have sent a message?

If your life, and the lives of your men, depended on you sending a message from the front line, which of these forms of communication would you choose?

Arts & Humanities
Research Council

